Not illustrated. 1921 Excerpt: .German forces, General Nivelle began his ambitious offensive (April 16, 1917). The first move was a sudden attack between Soissons and Rheims. The initial French success was spectacular, as seventeen thousand prisoners and seventy-five guns were taken in three days. But persevering in the struggle did not win anything of importance; when the balance of 1 On the other hand, the strengthening of the enemy s forces opposite my front necessarily brought about for the time being the characteristics of a wearing-out battle. Sir Douglas Haig s Despatches. Second Battle of the Aisne. gains and losses was struck, the French losses were found so heavy 1 in proportion to the gains that there was a great reaction in France. The battle had been a. test of the plan of General Nivelle, and he had only been able to make a poor showing for his theories. So...
