Its general principle is as follows: Each lever has a quadrant or sector forged on it, and the levers are all mounted in a frame, so that the sectors pass through a tier of locking bars. Each switch lever has one of these locking bars belonging to, and actuated by, it. Notches are cut in the sectors and in the locking bars in those positions in which the one should be allowed to pass through the other, and wherever locking is desired the bar or sector is left solid, and so erroneous movements are prevented. This system is so complete that an ordinary junction-frame is completely interlocked with only six moving pieces, and the above frame of eighty levers is interlocked with less than thirty moving pieces. The advantages naturally arising from this very great simplicity are as follows: 1. Certainty and promptness in the locking. 2. Great durability (the machines are guaranteed to require no repairs for ten years). 3. Great strength, all the moving parts being made of wrought iron, and machine cut. 4. All the locking gear is in sight, and is so near to the hand of the operator that he cannot strain or disable it. 5. The apparatus is all above the floor, thus avoiding the large holes usually required in the floor, and this greatly adds to the comfort of the signal houses. Price; 8 per Lever. SEMAPHORE SIGNAL-POSTS (WROUGHT IRON). Fig. 16. Signals...
